Biography and Artist Statement

Tom Corbin's introduction and subsequent career in sculpture has been based more on serendipity than calculation. Born in Dayton, Ohio in 1954; Tom's early fascination in art was inspired by his mother, an art teacher by trade. Despite studying painting and drawing at Miami University, Tom's original career pursuit was Business as an advertising executive. Tom's first brush with the third dimension came in a chance meeting with a bronze sculptor in 1982. Classes with this sculptor led to a deepened interest in bronze casting and thoughts of a career in art. In 1986, Tom left the secure confines of his advertising agency job for the unpredictability of life as a full time sculptor.

Now in his third artful decade, Tom's work appears in over 20 museums, galleries and showrooms. Individual collectors include Nicole Kidman, Emeril Lagasse, Jack Nicholson and the late Frank Sinatra. Public installation sites include the United Nations, The Kauffman Foundation, Paramount Pictures and Florida State University.

"I was initially attracted to the physicality and the dynamic nature of sculpture and was intrigued by the profound impact sculpture can have on an environment. As for bronze casting, the medium dictates a certain sense of tradition and order, which I continue to embrace. The challenge for me is to take the medium and create a tradition of something new."

Tom Corbin Process

The process of creating a bronze begins with the artist's completed sculpture. Tom models his work in wax, clay or plaster, which is supported internally with a wire "skeleton".

For pieces with elaborate detail and undercuts, the lost wax method is used. A flexible rubber mold is made around the original sculpture and reinforced with an outer plaster mold. The entire mold is then split open and the original sculpture is removed. The mold is then reassembled and filled with molten wax. After cooling, the wax duplicate is removed and coated with a ceramic slurry. The ceramic shell is then dried and heated in a kiln at 800°. The wax inside melts out or is "lost" creating an empty ceramic mold. Two thousand degree molten bronze is poured into the ceramic mold, which, upon cooling, is chipped off revealing a bronze duplicate of the original model.

For more symmetrical, low relief pieces such as furniture legs and lamp shafts, sand casing is the preferred method. The original sculpture pattern is placed in a metal box filled with extremely fine, clay like sand. As it is packed tightly around the pattern, the impression created in the sand serves as a mold of the original pattern. The sand mold is then split opened and the pattern removed. Molten bronze is then poured into the hollow interior of the mold creating an exact replica of the original sculpture.

With each method, the bronze casting is carefully inspected for imperfections, which are removed. The sculpture surface is then sandblasted and then chemically colored, or patinaed, through the use of heat and the artful hand of the patineur. The considerable handwork and the resulting variance in texture and color make each of Tom's works unique and one-of-a-kind.

CORBIN BRONZE

firehouse

After 23 years in the River Market, Tom Corbin has moved to a turn-of-the-century Kansas City, Kansas, firehouse. Built in 1912, this historic building has an alluring past. From fire station, to city hall (complete with jail cell), to private residence, the building has been transformed into pristine gallery space, modern offices and artist's studio. A gated sculpture garden displays more of Tom's work outside. And, yes, be reassured that the intact brass fire pole still works.
