Biography and Artist Statement

Tom Corbin's introduction and subsequent career in sculpture has been based more on serendipity than calculation. Born in Dayton, Ohio in 1954; Tom's early fascination in art was inspired by his mother, an art teacher by trade. Despite studying painting and drawing at Miami University, Tom's original career pursuit was Business as an advertising executive. Tom's first brush with the third dimension came in a chance meeting with a bronze sculptor in 1982. Classes with this sculptor led to a deepened interest in bronze casting and thoughts of a career in art. In 1986, Tom left the secure confines of his advertising agency job for the unpredictability of life as a full time sculptor.

Now in his third artful decade, Tom's work appears in over 20 museums, galleries and showrooms. Individual collectors include Nicole Kidman, Emeril Lagasse, Jack Nicholson and the late Frank Sinatra. Public installation sites include the United Nations, The Kauffman Foundation, Paramount Pictures and Florida State University.

"I was initially attracted to the physicality and the dynamic nature of sculpture and was intrigued by the profound impact sculpture can have on an environment. As for bronze casting, the medium dictates a certain sense of tradition and order, which I continue to embrace. The challenge for me is to take the medium and create a tradition of something new."

Tom Corbin Process

The process of creating a bronze begins with the artist's completed sculpture. Tom models his work in wax, clay or plaster, which is supported internally with a wire "skeleton".

For pieces with elaborate detail and undercuts, the lost wax method is used. A flexible rubber mold is made around the original sculpture and reinforced with an outer plaster mold. The entire mold is then split open and the original sculpture is removed. The mold is then reassembled and filled with molten wax. After cooling, the wax duplicate is removed and coated with a ceramic slurry. The ceramic shell is then dried and heated in a kiln at 800°. The wax inside melts out or is "lost" creating an empty ceramic mold. Two thousand degree molten bronze is poured into the ceramic mold, which, upon cooling, is chipped off revealing a bronze duplicate of the original model.

For more symmetrical, low relief pieces such as furniture legs and lamp shafts, sand casing is the preferred method. The original sculpture pattern is placed in a metal box filled with extremely fine, clay like sand. As it is packed tightly around the pattern, the impression created in the sand serves as a mold of the original pattern. The sand mold is then split opened and the pattern removed. Molten bronze is then poured into the hollow interior of the mold creating an exact replica of the original sculpture.

With each method, the bronze casting is carefully inspected for imperfections, which are removed. The sculpture surface is then sandblasted and then chemically colored, or patinaed, through the use of heat and the artful hand of the patineur. The considerable handwork and the resulting variance in texture and color make each of Tom's works unique and one-of-a-kind.

Tom Corbin Artist Statement

I was initially attracted to the physicality and the dynamic nature of sculpture and was intrigued by the profound impact sculpture can have on an environment. As for bronze casting, the medium dictates a certain sense of tradition and order, which I continue to embrace. The challenge for me is to take the medium and create a tradition of something new.

My work over the last two decades has experienced quite an evolution, that from a representational artist to an instinctive artist. Where my early sculptures were modeled in a traditional manner, my current work is more abstract and serves as a metaphor for the human condition. The common thread running through my evolving style is my love of the figure as muse. As for my furniture designs, I would agree with Warhol when he said, "The line between art and design is often blurred. I float between sculpture and functional pieces incorporating similar images into each." Functional art, as a result, seems to be a more appropriate title.

My thought process in producing a new work is essentially a planned accident. I begin with a general concept in mind, but whether I end up with that concept is not important. A work in process has a mind of its own and can take you down a totally unexpected but more satisfying path.

Tom Corbin Biography

Tom Corbin's introduction and subsequent career in sculpture has been based more on serendipity than calculation. Born in Dayton, Ohio in 1954, Tom's early fascination in art was inspired by his mother, an art teacher by trade. Despite studying painting and drawing at Miami University, Tom's original career pursuit was Business as an advertising executive. Tom's first brush with the third dimension came in a chance meeting with a bronze sculptor in 1982. Classes with this sculptor led to a deepened interest in bronze casting and thoughts of a career in art. In 1986, Tom left the secure confines of his advertising agency job for the unpredictability of life as a full time sculptor.

Tom landed his first major public commission in 1988. Additional commissions followed, along with the financial freedom for Tom to develop his own "speculative" sculpture. During this period, Tom was also experimenting with furniture design, an area that would soon play a major role in the growth of his studio operation.

Today, Tom's work appears in 22 showrooms and galleries internationally. Individual collectors include Mr. and Mrs. Tom Hanks, Nicole Kidman, Danielle Steel and the late Frank Sinatra. Public installation sites include the United Nations, The Kauffman Foundation, the Firefighter's Memorial, the Children's Fountain, University of Oregon and Florida State University. In addition to important public and private collections, his work has found its way onto the sets of some major motion pictures, among them True Lies, A Perfect Murder, It's Complicated and Transformers.

After 23 years in the River Market, Tom Corbin has moved to a turn-of-the-century Kansas City, Kansas, firehouse. Built in 1912, this historic building has an alluring past. From fire station, to city hall (complete with jail cell), to private residence, the building has been transformed into pristine gallery space, modern offices and artist's studio. A gated sculpture garden displays more of Tom's work outside. And, yes, be reassured that the intact brass fire pole still works.
